

Abstract

This thesis deals with crime of dangerous harassment (stalking) in Czech Republic. It focuses on current legislation and possible future legislation changes. It deals with the most common types of harassment and its specific relationship to domestic violence. It focuses not just on the personality of offender but also on status of the victims and its possibilities of protection against stalking. It also deals with the penalties imposed for this crime under Czech law and performs comparative study of Czech and international regulations, especially of Austria, German and the United States of America.